Take a stroll in the streets and it is not hard to notice that many are wearing sporty clothes. In fact, this has become an increasingly common trend and people are embracing this fashion style quickly. Why is this the case? Why have people given up business suits? ## FAST 系統

The fact that our local culture is fading should be a big warning – it means that we will lose all of our traditional trades very soon. As these traditional businesses are on the brink of extinction, we may not be able to show our next generations the companies or values that embody our HK traditional culture. Take Cha Chaan Teng, open air Dai Pai Dong, Shanghai barbers and shoe shiners as examples, these iconic cultural elements have been a part of HK for many decades. These small businesses and cultural elements show the world the determination and hard-work of HK people: our grandparents were willing to work as hard as possible to make their lives and the city better, even if they did not have enough resources. We should act as quickly as possible to preserve whatever we have left – our Yum Cha culture and wet markets deserve our protection and support. If we do not act fast, we will lose our collective memory very soon.

Beauty clinics & beauty treatment tragedies

Hong Kong Beauty Parlor Death Rings Alarm Bells

Outraged Hong Kong lawmakers are calling for stricter oversight of the beauty industry after a woman's visit to a beauty parlor ended in death this week.

The woman, aged 46, died Wednesday after receiving a blood transfusion that was supposed to enhance her vitality and physical appearance. The procedure, which involves extracting a person's blood, concentrating and processing it, and then re-infusing it back into the bloodstream, has been explored in Europe and elsewhere as a way to treat cancer patients, doctors said, but offers no proven cosmetic benefits. Three other women—aged 56, 59 and 60—are still in the hospital after receiving the treatment, the city's department of health said Friday.

The local beauty industry has seen its share of health concerns before. The Consumer Council, for example, says it's received over 40 complaints in recent years regarding a procedure called "microneedle therapy," which involves applying a roller embedded with tiny needles to the face, with women complaining that the device caused rashes, pain and dermatitis.

Another Hong Kong cosmetic clinic is being investigated for potential malpractice after a woman died while undergoing liposuction. The patient, a 32-year-old dance instructor, died of suspected anesthetic overdose.
